The Scottish Memorial

The 1955 Le Mans disaster had changed European motor racing overnight. Mercedes-Benz had withdrawn from racing, and countries such as Switzerland had banned circuit racing altogether. Although Mike Hawthorn was listed as the 1955 winner in his Jaguar D-Type, his pit entry manoeuvre had also caused an accident that claimed the lives of 84 people and highlighted that the French circuit was no longer up to the task of handling such fast cars. Work on a completely new pitlane, speed-reducing chicanes approaching the pits and track widening took 13 months before the traditional race was started in July 1956, though this time without World Championship status.

Ron Flockhart had joined Ecurie Ecosse for the 1956 season and lined up alongside his compatriot Ninian Sanderson in the privateer Jaguar D-Type. Two Scots in a Scottish team, proudly displaying their national colours of blue and white on the British car.

Whether it was down to the pouring rain, the numerous accidents or the fact that the competitors from Aston Martin and Ferrari were fielding cars with only 2.5-litre engines is impossible to say 70 years on. In the history books, anyway, the success of David Murray's private team occupies a special place, surpassed only by the Scottish one-two victory with the D-Type the following year.

Japanese Near-Sensation

Whilst the Japanese Maki Team was already disbanding at the famous 1976 F1 season finale at Fuji, a new Japanese team appeared in the paddock in the form of Kojima. The KE007 had been designed by former Maki engineer Masao Ono. It was very well built and, thanks to its sophisticated aerodynamics, showed considerable potential.

The competition was quite astonished when Masahiro Hasemi emerged in fourth place in the first practice session. During second practice, he was even on course to beat Mario Andretti's later pole time in the Lotus when a suspension component snapped whilst braking for the final corner, damaging the car.

In qualifying, the black newcomer still managed to secure 10th on the grid – ahead of 16 other cars from Lotus, Ligier, McLaren, Tyrrell and Brabham! Ultimately, it was the team's inexperience that prevented a top finish in the race. The Kojima had been built solely for this one appearance, tuned specifically for the circuit at Mount Fuji.

A full Formula 1 season had never been the team's objective. But what might have happened if the Kojima had actually started the race from pole position? As it stands, all that remains is the thrilling story of a near-sensation at the home Grand Prix – one that was not to be repeated during the second and final attempt in 1977.
