Wing Ban in Monaco

After the high rear wings on both Lotus 49b had broken at highspeed at the previous Grand Prix in Spain – leading to serious accidents involving Graham Hill and Jochen Rindt – there had already been a row between Rindt and Lotus boss Colin Chapman ahead of the Monaco Grand Prix. In a letter, the Austrian accused Chapman of not taking the safety of his cars seriously.

The stubborn Briton promptly replaced the Austrian with Richard Attwood for Monaco. But the Monaco organisers themselves also had serious concerns that, should a similar accident occur on the narrow street circuit in the Principality, spectators could lose their lives.

It was agreed that the wings would initially be permitted in practice but banned for the race. The rear wing was not allowed to be higher than the highest point of the car. For the teams, this meant a considerable amount of modification work, but the two race directors, Paul Frère and Charles Deutsch, were unwilling to take any risks.

Jo Siffert's privately entered Lotus 49b also presented an unusual sight after these modifications. The Swiss driver made the most of his talent despite the inferior car and managed to secure a place on the podium in third – just ahead of Team Lotus's stand-in driver Attwood. From the following Dutch Grand Prix onwards, all cars were fitted with new, flat but large rear wings.

Too late to succeed

Following its major rally successes with the Escort, Ford was urgently seeking a successor for the World Rally Championship from 1983. However, the Group B competition from Lancia, Audi and Peugeot had by then set the bar very high, and the advent of four-wheel drive technology now required a significantly greater investment.

None other than former Formula 1 designer Tony Southgate designed a prototype featuring what was perhaps the finest Group B rally chassis ever. However, the RS200 turned out to be a little too heavy and, with its 450 hp, was also outclassed by the competition in terms of power. To make matters worse, WRC homologation was delayed until February 1986.

As a result, the new mid-engined Ford missed its eagerly awaited debut at the Monte Carlo Rally. It was not until the 1986 Swedish Rally that Kalle Grundel and Benny Melander took to the start line for the first time in the new works car, setting three fastest special stage times in the snow of their home rally and engaging in a close battle with Juha Kankkunen's Peugeot and Markku Alén's Lancia.

Third place on its debut was promising, but it remained the RS200's best result in the World Championship, as the end of the brutal Group B cars was drawing near following Henri Toivonen's fatal accident. The 600 hp evolution car planned for 1987 was never fielded in the WRC.
